Harnessing synthetic active particles for physical reservoir computing
The processing of information is an indispensable property of living systems realized by networks of active processes with enormous complexity. They have inspired many variants of modern machine learning, one of them being reservoir computing, in which stimulating a network of nodes with fading memory enables computations and complex predictions. Reservoirs are implemented on...

tion of the United States Constitution would call for a very limited judicial role. My argument is directed against the idea that "fidelity to the Constitution" requires us to discount political justice more deeply than the text of the Constitution demands. On some conceptions of political justice, however, fidelity to justice requires that the judiciary abstain from deciding controversial issues of social policy and individual right.

1997] FIDELITY THROUGH HISTORY 1621

mit National Guardsmen to keep guns in their homes.²³ We could view the Bill of Rights as an awkward first step in a commendable direction, eventually pursued more adeptly by the general language of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Judges and scholars have not, however, been satisfied to treat the Bill of Rights in this way. They praise it as magnificent, not awkward, and view it as limiting, not supplementing, the Constitution's more abstract provisions. They contend, for example, that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects only rights named in the Bill of Rights. Forced to explain the point of including specific rights in the constitutional text, they maintain that the list is designed to constrain judges by prohibiting them from acting upon their best practical and moral judgments about what justice requires. This is the dead hand of the past with a vengeance, valuing past practices and history at the expense of not only justice but also the constitutional text itself.²⁴
